

Should Bootcamps be introduce<sup>t d</sup> for trouble maker<sup>s</sup> in Germany?

I think a lot of people would say "of course" but also a lot would say "no". I don't think it's a good idea to introduce<sup>t</sup> Bootcamps in Germany. These This are my arguments why I'm against Bootcamps in Germany:

First of all it cost<sup>s</sup> to much when parents say their there child should go into a bootcamp.

For example when the parents don't have a lot of money but their teenager only makes trouble they can't say that he/she must go into a bootcamp.

Second point is that it doesn't<sup>e</sup> work with some teenagers. Even if they were in a bootcamp and then came home it might* not have work<sup>ed</sup>. The first *might week they think it have<sup>has</sup> worked but when the teenager is back and hang<sup>s</sup> out! with his/her friends he/she can also become a troublemaker again.

But it is also important that they can't call their they parents when they don't feel good or when they want to come home.
Maybe they are being mistreated*<sup>v</sup> in the camp
and the leader doesn't do anything about it.

But the most important point for me is that the leaderss are often too strict and think the teens must be working so hard that they have problems in the end. For example they must work sixteen hours
and have two hours of freetime and to eat and only six hours to sleep, and I think that's too hard.

To sum up <sup>in</sup> my opinion it isn't good to introduce bootcamps for teenagers<sup>s</sup> in bootcamps. Germany

Hallo Liebes Enkelkind,

einige der Fehler hätten nicht sein müssen!

Dass Du „bootcamp“ mal klein und mal groß geschrieben hast, habe ich Dir nicht angestrichen. Korrekt wäre Kleinschreibung, da es kein eigentlicher Eigenname ist. Du solltest nur konsequent bei einer Schreibweise bleiben!

Liebe Grüße Oma
